Barking Up the Wrong Tree

One day Bertie Bird and his brother Billie were playing tag high in the sky, when a sudden windstorm swept up, carrying them far across the fields, away from home.

"We're never going to find our way back at the rate we're drifting!" Bertie trilled. "We must have gone miles, already."

"I know!" Billie peeped, fighting against the force of the strong wind. "Maybe we ought to perch someplace until this blows over. Then we won't get lost any worse than we are, anyway."

The two little birds swooped down and managed to come to a fluttery halt on one of the branches of a thick bush.

"At least we'll be protected from the wind, here," Bertie panted, "but I'm worried about finding our way home, later."

"Let's stop worrying about that for now and start worrying about getting something to eat," Billie suggested sensibly. "All this exercise has made me awfully hungry!"

"Me, too," Bertie nodded, glancing about. "Oh, look!" he twittered, pointing. "Folks in this neighborhood sure must like their feathered friends. There's a feeding station over there, and its sides keep the wind from blowing the goodies off."

Ducking their heads into the wind, the two little birds fought their way over to the feeding station.

"The food's almost gone, but there's still enough for a good snack," Bertie chirped.

Just as they began to peck at the food, a dark shadow swooped over their heads, and a raucous voice boomed in their ears.

"It's Blackie the crow!" Bertie gasped with fright.

"Everybody out!" Blackie cawed shrilly. He shoos the tiny bluebirds aside with menacing thrusts of his sharp bill.

"What are you doing here, you big bully?" Bertie said bravely as he flew to the top of the station with Billie.

"I always roam far and wide looking for food," Blackie snickered between greedy bites. "This happens to be one of my regular stops along the way."

"Won't you help us?" Billie said pleadingly. "We're lost and awfully hungry. How about sharing some of that food, or helping us find our way home again?"

"Nothing doing, sport," Blackie cawed rudely. "You'd better keep out of my way if you know what's good for you!"

"Chee, Billie," Bertie sighed, "the wind has died down enough for us to fly again. Maybe we'd better just get going."

Bertie turned to the large black crow.

"This certainly isn't very polite of you," he scolded. "We'd be more than willing to share our food with you if we were back home. Why, I saw the little girl who keeps a feeding station below our nest putting out a lot of food just before we left."

"What's that?" Blackie said with greedy interest glittering in his eyes. "If that's the case, there's no point in my hanging around here. Get out of my way, chums, I'm heading for a real feast!"

"Why did you tell him about that?" Billie groaned as Blackie flew away. "Now he'll go back there and swipe that food, too."

"Follow me," Bertie tittered, taking off after Blackie the crow. "We can always find more food, but we can't always find our way home. Blackie's helping us out whether he wants to or not. I told him about the food on purpose, and now he's leading us right straight back to our nest in Apple Tree Lane!"
